

ABSTRACT

A horizontal electrode having a small cross-section makes electrical contact with a chalcogenide memory element. The dimensions of the cross-section are controlled by conventional deposit/etch semiconductor processing steps. The resulting memory element can be driven by a CMOS steering element.